ABSTRACT

Educating women is a top priority for India's government and civil society because of the significant impact that educated women can have on the country's economic development. Education plays an essential role in empowering women since it equips them to overcome challenges, challenge traditional gender roles, and bring about positive changes in their lives. Due diligence into the role of education in empowering women is required in light of India's present rise to global level. Given that education can pave the way for women's empowerment, reduce inequalities, and raise their status in the home and community, it is imperative that we do all in our power to ensure that all women have access to quality education in this country. Emancipation can be defined as the process of bringing about social change by making it possible for individuals or groups to have greater say in matters of policy and practice. Hashemi Schuler and Riley (1996) state that when individuals are given the opportunity to thrive, their inherent talents are enhanced as they acquire more information, expertise, and experience. Providing another person with the autonomy to act on their own judgment, take charge of their own life, and think critically is the essence of empowerment. Participants gain agency over their own lives and futures as a result of this process. Every city, state, and nation has its share of people who lack access to basic civil liberties, and much of the time, those people don't even know they have any. When we welcomed these people into our society, women would inevitably be given priority. Women are the backbone of every civilization, that much is true. No one is prepared to accept this just yet, even though everyone knows it to be true. The result is a decline in women's status compared to previous eras. There was an obvious need to empower women due to the increasing devaluation of women, which included depriving individuals of their fundamental rights and lowering their social status. Across the world, people are talking and thinking a lot about how to empower women. No matter how fortunate we are to live in a free country, we must always remember to reflect on our level of independence and be thankful for the freedoms we enjoy. For quite some time, issues of gender inequality and harassment have been prevalent throughout society. Gender equality is thus an issue that affects people all across the world. When it comes to politics, the workplace, the education, inheritance, and marriage, men and women should be treated equally. There are now a number of women's groups fighting for equality, and new initiatives are also starting. The United States Constitution does not discriminate on the basis of gender, but women have long been denied the freedoms guaranteed by it.
